Egyptian authorities have blocked the website of Al Jazeera news channel, Al-Jazeera Mubasher reported. The original website was on an American server, but appeared to be hosted by the Egyptian company, Besselynet. However, the English version of the website was blocked by the Egyptian authorities on Sunday morning. The Egyptian authorities said on its Twitter account that the blocking of the website was part of a widespread crackdown on “organized protest” which began during the morning prayers. Last week, an Egyptian court ordered the shutdown of Facebook and Twitter, which were allowing access to the protest movement that has been an epicenter of anti-government protests since the overthrow of President Hosni Mubarak in early 2011. “The ministries of telecommunications, interior, defense, and justice have agreed to shut down the websites of Facebook and Twitter. They are responsible for any websites and social media. These days are crucial and must be utilized,” said Samer Samir, a member of the Egyptian National Council for Human Rights. The Egyptian authorities have also blocked access to the popular image-sharing site Facebook after President Hosni Mubarak’s departure from office. UPDATE: Al Jazeera tweeted that the website was temporarily blocked before restoring access.Data from an extensive government study out today found that the poor and unemployed are far more likely than the rich and working class to be obese, have high blood pressure, or suffer from lung, kidney and heart disease. Like the worst of us, poor women are also more likely than men to be obese, with the poor doing worse than both the working class and poor men. A detailed look at our data shows that poor women, no matter whether they are divorced or widowed, have higher rates of diseases that affect the heart, lungs, kidneys and the reproductive system than middle class women. They're also more likely to have high blood pressure, and more likely to suffer from diabetes
