If you've never used Photoshop before, you should first familiarize yourself with the basics of selecting, manipulating, and saving the image before engaging with the more advanced features.

Programmed Photoshop Workflow A Creative Suite workflow usually involves a series of steps that take an image from creation to completion. This involves a series of tasks that ultimately result in an accepted image that has no obvious flaws (such as pixel-level errors).
The same workflow can be used with other programs, but Photoshop excels at some techniques. Here is how to create a basic Photoshop workflow for beginners: 1. Choose any image type that you want to work on. Start with a ready-to-use image from a camera, scanner, or file. If you have to import the image yourself, always use the background setting as your first choice. For more on importing images, see Chapter 6. When you import the image, it is generally in RGB format. Unless you intend to create or modify the color levels, it is best to convert the image to CMYK. Chapter 7 shows you how to convert an RGB image to CMYK and alter its color levels. If you're importing a JPEG image, try to have it in 8-bits/channel. 2. Create an empty canvas in Photoshop as a place to paste your new image. Drag the new image on top of your canvas. The new image gets placed where the coordinates of the new canvas's top-left corner touch. If your images are too large to fit in one panel, you can create a separate canvas as a template for the image. 3. Edit the image. Choose Edit Edit Images. When you launch the Edit Images dialog box, you have a choice of which type of image to edit. If you want to edit just one image, choose it from the Open dialog box. Otherwise, choose from the Up and Down lists to select the image you want to open. 4. Load your background color. Choose any color you want to use as your background from the selected color box. For example, if you're creating a landscape that features a red brick wall, select a light red color. 5. Create your changes. Photoshop enables you to make basic adjustments to your image. You can add or subtract, rotate, scale, or flip your image. When you add new content, make sure that you include it

Q: Assigning value to a Generic Type without 'new' I am currently assigning a Collection.Add() to a generic type. But the problem is that when I try to compile the code a red squiggly line under Collection.Add() in the 'new' specifier. Is there a way around this? /// /// Add a to the IList /// /// The List /// The Type to Add public static void Add(this IList List) { List.Add(new T()); } A: You can't use generic types that way in C#, unless you specify the type they're going to hold; otherwise, the compiler assumes it's reference type and gives it the wrong type. You'll have to use a class, or perhaps an interface if you know you'll only ever use one type. A: Expanding on Tobias_E's answer, in order to make it a generic method: public static void Add(this IList list) where T : class { list.Add(new T()); } That's the idea, you can add any type that is a class to the list. Lai Li (writer) Lai Li (born 6 September 1958) is a writer, poet, translator and commentator. Q: How to make a HTTP 200 response in web3-ruby? I've been looking into web3, and have been playing around with some modules, such as web3-provider.js, web3-eth.js, web3-eth-contract.js, etc. One of the modules that comes with web3, is web3-provider.js, and it has a function called Provider.call. Here's the list of the possible parameters. In the context of web3-provider.js, the recommended method to achieve a HTTP 200 response is a poller method: var result = Provider.call(myContractInstance, myTransaction, { nonce: web3.eth.coinbase, max: 1, from:

{}, filter: {}, gas: 1e8, gasPrice: web3.toHex(web3.eth.pow(2, 18)), to: {}, value: web3.toHex(web3.eth .getBalance(web3.eth.coinbase)), data: '0x' + result.toString('hex') + '\x00', chainId: 3 }); var myResult = web3.fromWei(result.gas_used, 'ether'); I want to know what the web3-provider is doing behind the scene when the result of the poller method is a 200 response. Does anyone know how to achieve it in web3? A: There is no hard API call here. This is just how they would have implemented it. So every time they will make a call and get a response it will poll the blockchain again and if the response comes back as 200 then the result is used to return the value. Some notes You don't have to actually poll the blockchain, but in the above code they have poll block height 3 to ensure that at least the new block is loaded. They have written data: '0x' + result.toString('hex') + '\x00', which means that they have read the entire data payload from the block in hex and appended the '\x00' which signifies the end of the hex string. What you can do is use web3.eth.get
