What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.4.1)?

Monday, September 14, 2012 Amazingly, the most recent essay in a ten-part series by Sunlight's Jeff Larson is the first to argue that even the New York Times' style sheet includes "a rule--formalized by copy editors--against double-negative statements." Update: Yesterday, the New York Times announced an even bigger change, admitting for the first time that they've been using "primarily a style sheet rather than an editorial style guide for years." The Times simply began consulting a style sheet written by Tom McGinty, a researcher at the Linguistic Computing Lab. I was as surprised as anyone when I learned of the Times' switch to Tom's style sheet. I worked for several years at a newspaper where we all used a style guide, though we were well aware that it was not being updated as often as was necessary. But I was always impressed with the Times' style sheet--it was comprehensive and up to date. I never heard of Tom's style sheet, but then I never heard of the Times' style guide until very recently. For the past decade, the official style sheet used by the Times has been mandated by the paper's editors. It was at least 20 years old. In the past several years, we were working toward making the style guide more current and more understandable. One of our copy editors had learned that we were making an effort to improve the guide, and he asked to meet with me. We had never met before. He explained that he had never been able to understand what was in the style guide, and he didn't believe he would be able to look it up. He asked whether we should meet to discuss it. After meeting with him and some of the people working on the guide, I was satisfied that we should proceed. We started to look at more recent sources of style advice, like the media-specific and industry-specific style guides used by stations and writers in the news business. I asked some copy editors to help me revise the guide, and they did. It was made public some time later. We have continued to make changes in it. The most recent update was in January. While it's still a work in progress, we are pretty happy with the end result. Some of the revisions have been adopted wholesale by the Times, such as the addition of a note that we don't automatically
