Sequestered within a single spot on the right arm of the ABC transporter AdiC is a series of amino acid residues (in yellow) that have a highly significant amino acid physicochemical dissimilarity with the residues found in the substrate-binding sites of the protein. In A. fulgidus, the AdiC monomer contains two substrate-binding sites (in blue). Strategies to target bacterial adhesion to metals usually focus on the extracellular domains of adhesins, while the underlying intracellular transport protein is often not considered an important target. However, AdiC is a highly conserved ABC transporter present in many different gram-positive and gram-negative bacteria. In gram-negative bacteria, AdiC is thought to be an important regulator of metal homeostasis, and is the primary transporter of iron into the cytoplasm. In a recent study, published in Nature Microbiology, researchers at MIT and elsewhere in the U.S. and Canada have figured out how bacterial adhesins can block the transport of metals by the AdiC transporter. Zhang et al. modeled the crystal structure of AdiC and then used energy minimization to study the interactions between AdiC and the cytoplasmic domains of the recently discovered bacterial adhesins. They showed that the binding site of the adhesins was blocked by the binding of iron to the AdiC, and concluded that the binding of adhesins to AdiC works in a similar manner to the targeting of bacterial adhesins to the primary binding sites of host proteins. Zhang et al. are now focusing on what these studies reveal about how AdiC functions as a metal-binding protein. Overall, the findings are likely to have broad implications for research on metal import proteins in many organisms. "The findings of this study suggest that bacterial adhesins can bind to metal trans

Show spoiler (click to show) Been wondering too. I really don't see how it'd go to end with Fried and Rika on opposite sides. They've always loved each other though.

Show spoiler (click to show) Those two, plus Rika's monster-like reaction to being told that Fried wouldn't tell her his true name, and the implication that it's far worse than Fried's curse implies, seems to be pointing to Fried having made some sort of Faustian bargain with the devil somewhere down the line. Rika can't seem to say it when they're in the same room because it seems to destroy her, but after that she said that it wasn't Fried, then saw Fried healed, and then the shot ended. Show spoiler (click to show) It was a Black Magic!! lol Quote: Her body was inside his coffin, and she's acting like she has a bad cold. She's just playing along. Quote: Fried and Rika were together. Rika's reaction there suggests that she's in love with Fried just as much as he is with her. Show spoiler (click to show) When she sees him healed, yes, but he's simply acting along with her. Quote: She didn't even ask what's wrong with his arm, she immediately started calling out to him. She might see through his disguise and she might not, but her desire to have him near her doesn't seem to be diminished in any way. I don't think she sees through him at all. Perhaps her belief that Fried wanted to trick her in some way stems from a reaction I've seen several times, where when suddenly seeing a
