In the new research, Federico Pico and Jon Gabriel of the University of California, Berkeley, demonstrated that this is not always the case: When people are consciously aware of an object being associated with memory, they also recall the memory, even when they are not consciously aware that they are recalling it. "The brain is still working when the mind stops thinking about something," says Pico. "When we're aware of an object, we're also aware of all the associations we have with it. It takes memory retrieval effort to suppress what we think we know about something. The mind does this automatically." In one experiment, participants were exposed to an image for a few seconds, then had to make a memory association. When they were later asked if they were familiar with the image, they consistently said yes, even though they knew that the image could not be associated with any previous memories. This shows that the association was automatically activated in their brain. Another experiment led Pico and Gabriel to ask participants to recall the associations between certain pairs of objects. After being exposed to an image of two objects linked through an association, each participant was asked to recall the linked images. The participants were then presented with a pair of objects and asked to recall the pair to which they were linked. Even though this experiment was carried out consciously, there were no differences in recall between the subjects and a control group. These results suggest that unconscious associations are more readily retained than conscious ones. "We can never be sure that any recall in
