There is no way of detecting when it crashes, as the browser will silently close. The best I can do is log some user data once it has crashed to a log file, but I would like to be notified of the crash instead of trying to guess when the crash happened. Is there any way to detect it? A: WebView has method getSource(). This can be used to detect a crash. If the source of the WebView is malformed, a RuntimeException will be thrown. For example, if your JavaFX application is running inside a servlet container, the servlet container can call WebView.getSource(). If the WebView has a source URL, then this will cause a RuntimeException to be thrown. For example, if your WebView has a source URL, then this method will detect the error. Here is an example of how this can be used in a JavaFX application:

javafx.stage.Stage; public class App extends Application { @Override public void
