The effect of the orientation of a non-convex, moderately charged molecule (a small membrane protein) on the ionic transport through a nanopore is investigated using molecular dynamics simulations. Starting with either a transmembrane- or a surface-confined condition, the nanopore is expanded. The corresponding changes of the electrostatic potential are used to calculate the electrostatic potential and field at the pore walls, respectively, which are the input parameters for constructing a pore model. Simulation results show that the orientation of the protein has a significant influence on both the electric potential and the field within the nanopore. The simulations also reveal that both the electric potential and the field are affected most by the type of charges at the protein's exposed-side. The invention relates to antennas for communications systems and, more particularly, to phased antenna arrays for antenna systems. Antenna systems require devices which can be used to steer a beam of radio frequency (RF) energy. Typically, the ability to steer the beam is achieved by adjusting the phase of the RF signal which is applied to the antennas of the array. A phased array antenna consists of multiple elements where each element includes a beam former and phase shifter. A beamformer is a device which receives and combines multiple signals for the 09e8f5149f
