The "real" Nobel Prize-winning neuroscientist John O'Keefe now seems to be backtracking from the impressive conclusions in his 2010 book, The Astonishing Hypothesis, which argued that, contrary to mainstream neuroscience, human thinking arises almost entirely in our brains -- rather than in our external senses -- and not, as most scientists say, in the external environment at all. Here is what O'Keefe had to say about the book in an interview with NeuroQuantology.co.uk, where he also stated that brain science is now best understood as "just another epistemology" (i.e. theory of knowledge), rather than as a science. From the interview (emphasis added): Question: John, what should be the term for the neurosciences as they are currently conceived and run? Answer: I would say we are stuck in the scientism phase. I don't think we're in the phase of mature science, we're still in the stage of scientism. I think that the way we communicate science with general public and make claims about it, I don't know, can be very misleading. For example I, I guess my biggest critique is I think this whole neuroscience is more, it's in a way just another epistemology, as opposed to a science. You can't have knowledge of the brain, because it's an organic thing. You can't have research of the brain, because it's an organic thing. So the way we talk about it, the way we talk about its relationship to perception, it's not a science. It's a pseudo science. It's just a way we talk about the things in the brain, and we're very good at that. But we are very bad at giving it a scientific context, and trying to integrate all these 6a5af4ab4c
