Sarah Tew/CNET If you've ever been on a city train and had the phone in your pocket buzz while riding, you may want to take a close look at your mobile data plan. That buzz can mean a call from a telemarketer and an unknown number. The phone number could even be a real number, one that's known to the person in your pocket. But in either case, chances are it wasn't you calling them. New data from mobile analytics firm One Touch ID show that the world's most popular mobile phone users, known as Samsung Galaxy S6 users, got calls and texts from unknown numbers more often in 2017 than in any of the previous years. Costs from unknown phone calls and texts For many of these unknown callers, they are likely trying to connect with a business or organization. It could be a business you know, like the store you just happened to be in that week. Or maybe it's a company you've never heard of before. You see, when someone texts or calls a person or company, the person answering the phone can look up the company in a database, figure out who is being called or texted from the number and find out more information about them. Think of it as a marketing ploy: more people are looking at your business, and they're making the call or text to get information about what you do, where you're located, when you're open and what you offer. All things businesses are looking for in ads, whether they're physical ads or digital ones. The World Health Organization found that half of all new international calls come from mobile phones, and that 70
