Q: What is the significance of bringing the sword down at the same angle it was created in Senin on last year's elections? During the early morning hours of 9 May, 2012, the campaign for the parliamentary elections of Tunisia began. Upon hearing of the upcoming elections, Prime Minister Habib Essid announced that he would stay in power if he retained the number of seats he won four years earlier. The presidential-looking candidate was later revealed to be the incumbent president Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, who was driven off to Tunisia's new capital in the early hours of Thursday. Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, the first and only head of state in Tunisia's independence, remains in power. The country is in a severe financial crisis and public anger is growing, but no one is calling for a return to military rule. ... The security forces are staying on high alert after a series of strikes and shootings aimed at ruling-party candidates. At least five candidates were killed on Wednesday alone. An online poll that appeared in the last five days of this year's election showed that the majority of people in Tunisia favoured the candidate of the Justice and Development Party (PJD), the same party of Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, to be the next Prime Minister. Another online poll showed another member of the same party to be the most voted candidate for Prime Minister. As I recall, in the last set of elections, in 2010, Ben Ali was also declared the winner. ... the day-to-day life of Tunisians on the streets of the capital, Tunis, was as normal as it could be. Even if the prospects of Ben Ali leading the new government were dim, it was still considered not only unlikely, but even unthinkable that the Tunisians would overthrow him on the streets. Of course, the person who actually won the elections was the same individual who would go on to receive several awards for his work in the political sphere, including the Nobel Peace Prize in 2011. (Source) Interestingly, there are ten arguments listed in this Wikipedia article on the change in Ben Ali's role in Tunisia's history: Although they still have the words "President of the Republic" on the back of their clothes, Tunisians are calling them the head of state. A significant number of Tunisians reject the system of government with the second article of the constitution, because it entrenches the power of a leader (President Ben Ali) over

Q: Create ServiceStack client with constructor injection on multiple instances I have an.asmx Web Service written in C# and created using ServiceStack. If I create a service client (a MyServiceClient) on a singleton scenerio I'm fine, but if I create a client that needs to be used on multiple instances I get a null reference exception. I've tried to create the client manually with the constructor injection; but it looks like there is something missing. Do I have to register the used class as Dependency Injection on MyServiceClient class? I've tried that but I don't know if I missed something. MyServiceClient client; client = new MyServiceClient(""); client.MyMethod(); This is the constructor for MyServiceClient: public MyServiceClient(string uri) { _textService = new TextServiceClient(uri); ... } The TextServiceClient is another class. A: What do you get for the exception message? Have you already checked which uri you are using in the client, and if it is null, that might be the reason for the exception. As for your question about DI for the client; I have successfully used DI with ServiceStack in the following way: AppHost: public class AppHost : AppHostBase { public AppHost() : base("My App", typeof(MyService).Assembly) { Plugins.Add(new TextServiceFeature()); // Set the breakpoint here to check for an null uri Console.WriteLine("In AppHost constructor"); } public override void Configure(Funq.Container container) { Container = container; string uri = ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["MyTextServiceUri"]; container.Register(() => new MyServiceClient(uri)); } } MyServiceClient: public class MyServiceClient : ClientBase, IT
