Q: Swift - removeSubrange changes all objects and throws an error I have a little app to manage some images. So I have different buttons "add" "edit" and "delete". Every button has its own array for images. I can add but I have a problem to delete. I add the images but if i use removeSubrange it changes all the images array. But it throws an error if i don't remove everything, Thread 1: Fatal error: Index out of range I use this code:

self.imagesArray.removeSubrange(0...self.imagesArray.count) My problem is that I need to remove every single image and when I press "delete" all the images that are in the array change to a white color. But when I use the same code to change all the array to "no picture" but this code doesn't crash the program: self.imagesArray.removeAll() How can I repair my code to remove every image and not crash the program? A: As the error message says, you're trying to remove items from an array which is out of bounds, i.e. an index out of range. It is clear from the error message that you're accessing elements at index [0] of the array, which is out of bounds since your array's length is 1. If you delete the first item of an array, which has length N, then there are no longer any elements left to be deleted. That's why the error disappears when you call removeAll. To fix this, always call removeItemAt:. It takes an index (within bounds) as its first argument.

self.imagesArray.removeItemAt(0) You'll need to call this before you pass the array to removeSubrange. EDIT: In response to comments, if you insist on calling removeSubrange, then you need to take indices into account. Technically, it's safe to call removeSubrange with an index range that is out of bounds, but it's best not to do that. Q: Python - Efficient way to group by key? I have an object import hashlib >>> thing= hashlib.md5('gnome').hexdigest() >>> thing '11ce2c4820fe9b5fc8a5ffba'

What's New in the Photoshop CC?

The concept for the new machine class model All sensors (radar, scanner, camera, lidar, drone, telemetry, gyroscope, accelerometer, etc.) have been integrated into the machine model. This includes sensing, forecasting, action, reactivity, workload management, etc. - hence the term "smart machine". The machine has to fly at a fast speed to capture multiple targets in the display. Each target is initially taken into account through its own interaction rules based on real-world observation, and then their characteristics are explored as a group. In our project, the machine model takes into account rules of behaviour inspired by the behaviour of birds and their environment. If the rules allow it, the machine is likely to capture the targets. But if not, the machine can avoid the targets, fly back and move in a different way for the next attempt. “In the ideal, the airplane kills the target first and flies back to the hangar without touching the target. In the worst case, the bird loses his life and the hangar is trashed.” Swedish aviation expert Göran Gardh (1925 - 1994) Some of our partner organizations have used the smart machine solution in other areas than fighter aircraft, e.g. real-time reconnaissance aircraft or air combat in F-16 fighters

Medial posterior arch height of the proximal tibia in children and adolescents as measured by magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). We measured the height of the medial posterior arch of the proximal tibia in children and adolescents aged 4-18 years by magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). We hypothesized that the height of the medial posterior arch would be reduced with the increase in age and age-related maturation of the growth plate. An MRI scanner was used to measure the height of the medial posterior arch of the proximal tibia in 174 knee MRIs of patients aged 4-18 years. The height of the medial posterior arch was measured in three measurement planes in each section, which were coronal, axial and
