I'm looking at buying a new set of pedals for my board. I've been using 1u single-coated, rigid SU's, and they've been great. I started using them with my friends massive clunking, rigid, single-coated pedals; they were so much smoother and quieter. I'm just wondering, what are G-Guides and G-Locks, and what advantages do they have over single-coated, rigid SU's? A: Well, from what I understand, the G-Guides are EASIER to clean and cut than single-coated pedals. They're also easier to bond than single-coated, which I understand is the downside of them (at least that's what I've heard). Also, when you're on a bike, and you're just stepping over objects on the ground, you don't really notice them. With these, you can even wear them and step over the threshold, and suddenly you're getting pulled back. You can feel it. Oh, and the grip is better than single-coated too, which is a plus... Also, the "glass" side of the G-Locks are more scratch-resistant than single-coated plastic, which is nice to have since those are harder to clean. As far as advantages, that's it. Single-coated are better than G-Guides, but G-Guides are better than single-coated. How to do a head roll "To do a head roll, stand up straight and start shrugging your shoulders from the top of your neck to your shoulders. You should be moving them up and down, not side to side. Start by doing a few with your face pointed upward. At the end, turn your face downward toward the floor to start over." - McGraw You want to be able to read my script? No problem.
