Most currently available implantable cardiac monitors are external devices. External monitors have the advantage of not being permanently implanted into an animal so that they may be removed when necessary. However, since an external monitor is worn on the body of the animal, it is susceptible to a variety of external conditions which can affect its operation. These external conditions may include weather conditions, sanitary conditions, and shock, for example. These factors can cause the loss of the monitor or the loss of its battery. Furthermore, and given that the external monitor is commonly worn by the animal's owner, the owner may be unwittingly kept apprised of an animal's condition on a day-to-day basis. Conventional external monitors also have the disadvantage of providing only a single type of data output. For example, conventional external devices provide either a signal proportional to

>The effect of maternal depression on fetal neurodevelopment. Studies have shown that maternal depression affects fetal neurodevelopment; however, the extent to which depression symptoms alter fetal neurodevelopment is unclear. In the present study, we examined the effects of depression symptoms on fetal neurodevelopment using structural magnetic resonance imaging (MRI).

The participants included 60 pregnant women, 12 to 29 weeks of gestation, as subjects. The Beck Depression Inventory was used to measure the levels of depression. The MRI data were transferred to a workstation and analyzed using FreeSurfer, version 5.3.0. Neurodevelopmental deficits were present in 32 (53%) of the 60 fetuses. After adjustment for potential confounding variables, depression level was found to be significantly associated with decreased volumes of total brain, total grey matter, parietal lobe, and cortical grey matter in the fetal brain, but not with the volumes of frontal lobe, basal ganglia, ventricle, or cerebellum. The results of the present study suggest that depression during pregnancy affects neurodevelopment of the fetal brain.
