Transcatheter arterial embolization for the treatment of arteriovenous malformations of the limbs: A review of the literature. Transcatheter arterial embolization (TAE) has been widely used for the treatment of arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) of the lower extremities. However, its efficacy and adverse effects have not been established. The purpose of this study was to assess efficacy and adverse effects of TAE for the treatment of AVMs. A systematic literature review was performed using the keywords "transcatheter arterial embolization," "Arteriovenous Malformation," "lower extremity," "adverse effects," and "efficacy." Only studies with at least 10 patients who underwent TAE for limb AVMs were selected. The search yielded 55 manuscripts. Nine studies with a total of 224 patients (211 embolizations, 23 embolizations + surgery) were included. After a mean follow-up time of 20.8 ± 13.0 months, the mean AVM obliteration rate was $91.3 \pm 4.4\%$ and the mean rate of freedom from complications was $94.5 \pm 4.1\%$. Local recurrences after TAE occurred in 25 patients (11.1%). The current literature suggests that in experienced centers TAE is an effective and safe treatment modality for AVMs of the lower extremities with long-term efficacy and freedom from complications.. The lead author of the report, Ryan Brooks, has stated that while the out-of-school activities appear not to cause any physical harm, they are unhealthy for children. Poor financial accountability A study by the National Association of Secondary School Principals found that very few schools were held accountable for the costs associated with running their schools. Responding to criticisms made in the NASSP study, the Local Government Association noted that it had "more fully researched and understood" how out-of-school activities were funded and that all schools in England were expected to respond to all funding calls, regardless of the time of year. The LGA stated that "to ask more schools to do more and to ask more difficult things of them is just unreasonable" In an interview with The Times on 15 July 2011, Michael Gove, the Education Secretary, stated that e79caf774b
