Technetium-99m is an isotope of potassium that is widely used in nuclear medicine. Technetium has a high positron-emitting probability and is very effective in visualizing some types of organs. Technetium can be used to study blood flow and metabolic processes in the brain and heart. In the brain, for example, technetium scintigraphy may show localized areas of abnormality due to some type of disease. A known gamma camera system includes a coincidence circuit having a pair of scintillation detectors with the energy of gamma photons detected by the scintillation detectors being measured. If one scintillation detector detects two gamma photons, then an electron from the nuclear decay of the positron emitter is captured and accelerated in a direction substantially opposite to the direction of the two gamma photons. The two gamma photons strike the other scintillation detector in coincidence. As such, in the known gamma camera, a coincidence circuit permits a signal to be sent to a coincidence circuit only if both detectors detected the gamma photons in coincidence, while a standalone detector cannot transmit a signal to a coincidence circuit when only one of the detectors detects a gamma photon.
