These waxy materials are frequently used because they have excellent lubricating properties and because they can be blended into the lubricant without significantly affecting the viscosity of the oil. One of the most widely used methods for preparing waxy materials is by the catalytic cracking of an appropriate petroleum feedstock. The cracking products consist of light waxy hydrocarbons having four or more carbon atoms, in a range of from about C.sub.10 to C.sub.20. These waxy materials are not used as viscosity index additives, as their low molecular weight does not make them useful. As the molecular weight of the waxy material is raised, the viscosity of the material increases. Consequently, such materials are useful as viscosity index additives. The high molecular weight materials are more viscous than the low molecular weight materials and, hence, can be added to a lubricant to reduce its viscosity without affecting its lubricating properties. Waxy materials prepared by the catalytic cracking of petroleum fractions are highly desirable as viscosity index additives. However, the catalytic cracking of the petroleum fraction produces a hydrocarbon product which has a significant concentration of olefins. Olefins are known to be unstable in the presence of certain lubricating oils and to form gums when the oils are used with the waxy additive. The formation of the gums causes the viscosity of the oil to increase, thus rendering the oil useless for its intended purpose. Gums are formed, inter alia, by reactions of the
