But before we start, we should first establish the issue itself. After all, isn't it a known fact that the font actually matters in our text-based solutions? What if somebody decides to rely on Special, Calibri or any other similar alternative to create their text document, but after choosing the preferred one, the text turns out to be bigger and everything is shifted out of place. And then the results: As we can see, one line of text wasn't bad at all. However, the remaining two options were pretty much useless. So, is it possible to improve upon them by merely using some conditional formatting? The answer is YES. After all, wasn't the most significant problem already solved? The text will be read by a computer program, which can be easily formatted. The only thing you need is to learn how to do it using different macros and tools. If you'd like to learn how to use conditional formatting to solve text problems, you can download our eBook and read about it right here.
