With all due respect to my co-pilot, who on this December day of 2010 must be rolling over in his grave as he once again must watch our company try to persuade him to pack up and take a corporate buyout offer from another firm, today's blog is going to be about a CEO. John Chambers, who has a combined 55 years of industry experience, received the Lifetime Achievement Award at the recently concluded Analyst Meeting held in New York. Lest you think he is ever getting too old, here's his resume: After all, it's not like he is getting any younger. He joined the company in 1978, so he could be a fit for the next generation. Anyone else for a reunion? John is an accomplished executive with a proven track record of success in building and leading consumer companies. You can read his bio here. John, an active member of the Cisco Board, is an avid member of the BNI. In fact, at BNI's Annual Conference this year, he was the keynote speaker and received the Lifetime Achievement Award for his record of service. You also can visit him at Cisco Live, where he will be part of the expo for 2 days.

Q: How to get last part of text, only if it's the last occurrence of text? Hi I have an old Wordpress site, where a recent update has created a broken image, which causes all of the images to be encoded with the same ID. I'm using the Genesis Wordpress Framework, which is setting variables like `$post->post_content` in there. I'm using the `_content` in a widget to populate the main content of the page. I need to remove everything before the last occurrence of the first word, only if there is a last occurrence of the first word. I tried: `$post->post_content = strip_tags($post->post_content);`

`$post->post_content = explode(" ".$post->post_content." ");`
`$post->post_content = array_slice($post->post_content, -1, 1);` But it doesn't work, it just outputs the first and last letter of the image. The Wordpress text function is probably having an effect on it. Can someone help? Thank You! A: I think you need to use the `explode`

The Engadget Show, Episode 1: I have a podcast This is it, the big day that I've been waiting for. For the last three weeks, I have been poring over scripts, making sure that things go just right. That the show actually makes sense. That we don't miss anything important. Advertisement And, to be honest, it feels a little too real, to be doing this in front of a crowd of real people. I don't want to screw up. So, I'm on the Engadget live show today, and I'll be taking questions right from the chatroom. This probably isn't the most efficient way to run an interview, but it worked for me. You can ask questions while we're on, and then, when I introduce you to our guest, we can continue talking there. I'll be joking about some of the things, and I'll probably slip up here and there. But, hopefully, at the end, I'll make you smile and laugh a little bit, and we can all agree that we had a really good time doing this.Q: How do I properly implement the file-based logging system in Java? This is for a very simple GUI application using Swing and a standard Java development IDE. I've been dealing with system errors and crashes in my application. I've previously used to have a `log()` function inside each of my classes, and then - on an error condition - would be able to display the `log()`. In the debug version of the application, I can use a serial communication to monitor the logs. However, I'm not sure this is a good system, because it's not 'solid'. I like knowing that my logs are file based, which makes it much easier to monitor them. Should I always use a file-based logging system, or is there another way to monitor system logs? A: I've used the `java.util.logging` library for a while in J2EE applications. In swing, you can add listeners to your logging framework. So you could collect all the information you need and put it in a `JPanel`. A: I think it is always better to implement your own logging system. A lot of built in logging systems require the user to think about where to write to and doesn't enforce any convention. For example `System.err.println(..)` usually
