How does gestational hypothyroidism affect neonatal thyroid function and neurodevelopmental outcome in infants of women with hypothyroidism? To evaluate the effects of maternal hypothyroidism on neonatal thyroid function and neurodevelopment in infants of women with hypothyroidism.

Retrospective chart review of 40 mothers with hypothyroidism, 41 mothers with gestational thyroiditis, and 42 controls. The maternal hypothyroid group included 38 women with subclinical hypothyroidism, and 2 with primary hypothyroidism, and one with subclinical hypothyroidism who was put on thyroid hormone replacement during pregnancy.

Neonatal thyroid function in hypothyroid infants was lower at birth and during the neonatal period.

Neonatal thyroid function in hypothyroid infants remained lower compared with that in the other groups. In hypothyroid infants, the cord serum levels of total triiodothyronine (T3) were lower in the appropriate-for-gestational-age (AGA) (23 ± 6.2 ng/dL) and large-for-gestational-age (LGA) (25 ± 6.4 ng/dL) groups than in the growth-retarded (GR) group (28 ± 6.1 ng/dL). The levels of free T3 (FT3) in the hypothyroid group were lower in the LGA group (2.5 ± 1.2 pg/mL) than in the GR group (3.1 ± 1.5 pg/mL).

Neonatal thyroid function in hypothyroid infants was lower in comparison with normal babies and babies of mothers with thyroiditis. The thyroid function was more severely impaired in the LGA and GR groups.

This study suggests that neonatal thyroid function may play an important role in determining the risk of neurodevelopmental impairment in children. Get breaking news alerts and special reports. The news and stories that matter, delivered weekday
