The technical innovation is certainly interesting, but the tools used to capture and interpret the data allows for unexpected and sometimes amusing moments to emerge onscreen. For example, during a highlight reel, the player motion capture data shows that, despite her tiny frame, striker Nadine Angerer kicked the ball with a massive amount of force and was likely unaware of the strength of the kick. Regardless of the validity of the argument, I think it's pretty cool to see real-life data collected and translated into the game for a slight (though probably harmless) amount of humor. FIFA's 1.0 trailer is out, and as expected, it includes a look at the new HyperMotion Technology that's being used in the game to add a realistic amount of animation to players. I'm not really that excited by that, because I'm sick of that kind of marketing in FIFA games. We saw that in FIFA 14, when EA advertised the game as the new "first person" soccer game, when it wasn't. This time around, EA's campaign is misleading. The game isn't actually a first-person soccer game, but it's being marketed as a first-person soccer game. It's a new motion-capture animation technology. That's it. While I think that the technology is pretty cool, I'm not so excited about it that I'm spending my hard-earned money on a FIFA game simply because it has a cool technology tag. I'll probably buy it when it comes out, I guess, but I can't make the claim that I'm paying for it to be a "first person" game. I don't want to take anything away from the technology. I'm sure it's an incredible feat that EA and DICE have pulled off. But I'm not sure I can trust that a sports game is going to be the best showcase of the technology. I'm all about motion-capture technology, and I love the idea of seeing, for instance, Dwight Howard or Patrick Kane realistically pouncing on a ball, but I'm not so sure about how much of this technology will translate to the game screen. There'll be scenarios that don't look right, certainly, but I'd like to see how far they'll go to accurately portray these motion capture sequences. So far we've seen shots of players running, jumping, and making successful catches, but no tackling. We've seen

Features Key:

- Realism. True player likeness and performance are measured using Motion Atlas to create far more authentic on-field player interaction. Authentic player reactions, body mechanics, and behaviour are driven by meticulous data collected from real-life player movement. No data is copy-pasted or out of context, meaning every single movement of your players leads to a unique, life-like playstyle of each character.

- Artificial Intelligence. Introduce Artificial Intelligence in the game. AI sets can now propel the players even faster at your pace. Always be on top of your game.
  - Match Day Experience. Control your team by leading your players through the match. Make substitutions on the fly, shift roles and play styles to put your tactical know-how on display. Play long-form fast-moving matches or the classic set piece-heavy tournaments to perfect your dribbling skills and aerials.
  - Football development. Define the training environment, perfect your skills and progress through youth clubs to reach the top of your game. Define personal training schedules and objectives for the players of your choice. And watch them grow with skill pass attacks and dribbling. Celebrate your players' hard work.
  - Dedicated coaching. FIFA 22 features a brand new coaching system. Choose between five different depth of coaching roles to guide players in your squad. Customise formations, set-plays and coaching routines. And use the Assistant Coach to support your tactics on and off the pitch.
  - Innovative gameplay. Masterfully crafted and entertaining gameplay is at the center of what we build at EA SPORTS. For FIFA 22, we have re-imagined match presentation and goal kicks that make hockey-style penalty kicks a thing of the past. We deliver on the game's many cool new features, through unique presentation, gameplay and online community elements.
