It is often desired to reheat a food or other product in a microwave oven from a defrosted condition. Also, it is often desirable to obtain a warm, moist "tuna" effect when heating a food product such as a cut of meat, or fish such as a tuna fish. Microwave ovens that can be used to heat large quantities of food in a short period of time are commercially available, as are microwave ovens that can be used to cook a large portion of food at one time. However, it is sometimes difficult to adequately heat a food product to the desired degree when cooking it in a microwave oven in a relatively small quantity in a relatively short time period. In the case of cut of meat, for example, a cutting board and spatula might be required, so that a cook can slice a fresh cut of meat to create a relatively small quantity of fresh meat. With this approach, the fresh meat is often difficult to cook in a relatively short time period, such as in an amount that can be cooked in a one-minute cycle. In addition, it is often difficult to reheat food, or parts of food such as a piece of a cut of meat, once it has been cooked in a microwave oven. There is a need for a new microwave oven that can heat a food product or other food product in a short time period, and also allow the food product to be reheated after it has been cooked in the microwave oven. There is a further need for a new microwave oven that can effectively cook and/or reheat a relatively small quantity of food product or other food product in a short time period, and that can be used with a variety of food products. SSF project SeismicSurveying. Q: Why does the low-fat egg fried in a standard egg-on-sticks pan not fluff as much as in an all-white pan? This question is related to How to prepare up white-on-whites when frying? Instead of using no-added oil, I fried 2 low-fat eggs in a standard egg-on-sticks pan (with a nonstick coating). The fluffiness was not as much as in the all-white pan. What is the difference?
