This research project was initiated during the initial funding period of this award. The overall objective is to provide insight into the molecular-biological basis of the host immune response to the oncogenic human papilloma (HPV) virus infection. HPV is the most common sexually transmitted infection in the world and is a causative agent of cervical cancer. Despite a high prevalence of infection, there are no effective vaccines or therapies available to treat this infection. In preliminary studies, we have established that human cervix epithelial (HCep) cells, which spontaneously acquire a transformed phenotype in culture, respond by up-regulating IFN-c and subsequently stimulating the synthesis of class I MHC antigens. IFN-c augmentation was abrogated by the transfection of cells with a mutated HPV 16 E6 gene. These data suggest that the immune response to HPV infection is dependent upon the effect of HPV viral proteins on host cell molecular machinery. Using two different approaches, we now plan to characterize the molecular mechanism of IFN-c induction following infection with the oncogenic HPV 16 and 18 viruses. Specifically, these studies will define the signal transduction pathways induced by these viruses leading to IFN-c up-regulation in human cells and may reveal possible targets for therapeutic intervention. Finally, these studies may provide clues to the genetic basis of the spontaneous acquirement of a transformed phenotype in cultured epithelial cells. We propose to investigate the relationship between normal epithelial cell differentiation and virus-induced transformation. We will develop a model system by which epithelial cells will be transformed in vitro using the HPV 18 oncogene. Our preliminary results indicate that the HPV 18 oncogene transformed epithelial cells can interfere with the normal differentiation process when these cells are exposed to regulatory molecules in the culture environment. This system will be used to study the basis of the interaction of HPV oncogenes with host cell differentiation. These studies may reveal gene targets that are important for the pathogenesis of cervical cancer and that could potentially provide clues as to the molecular mechanisms that govern the differentiation and growth of epithelial cells.Q: What are the consequences of using no memory or swap? Let's say that the following code or fork() function is running: void* fork() { char* sig; const char* funcName = "fork"; /*... */ // fork() sig... sig = __func__;
