Progressive isometric exercise is accompanied by early initiation of the systemic inflammatory response in patients with acute coronary syndrome. Cardiac stress induced myocardial injury has been linked to an early systemic inflammatory response. The progression of myocardial damage can be evaluated by analysis of circulating markers of inflammatory, humoral and coagulatory response. The aim of this study was to analyze the circulating markers of inflammatory, humoral and coagulatory response during and after progressive isometric exercise in patients with acute coronary syndrome (ACS) and in a healthy population. A total of 30 patients with ACS and 30 healthy volunteers were studied. The markers of inflammation, coagulation, and fibrinolysis were assessed in the acute phase of ACS and in the follow-up. Progressive isometric exercise resulted in increase of circulating markers of inflammation, coagulation and fibrinolysis, which was more pronounced in the ACS group. The increase in the inflammatory markers was higher in the ACS group and persisted longer, while the activation of coagulation was higher in the control group. Progressive isometric exercise induces increase in the markers of systemic inflammation, thrombin generation and fibrinolysis in patients with ACS, which is more pronounced in comparison to the healthy population. These results indicate a higher activation of the coagulation and fibrinolytic system in patients with acute coronary syndrome.

Limited evidence for an association between reproductive mode and infection with Staphylococcus aureus. Staphylococcus aureus is a major human and animal pathogen which is commonly associated with pregnancy and neonatal sepsis in industrialised countries. The risk factors for infection are only partially known, but there is evidence that genetic factors play a role. To investigate the role of reproductive mode in the transmission of S. aureus, we studied the strains isolated from humans and domestic animals. S. aureus from different sources were collected in Germany and tested for susceptibility and plasmid content. A total of 494 human isolates were divided into seven groups (breast-feeding mothers of young infants, mothers with breast-feeding infants, other mothers, other pregnant women, pregnant women with no breast-feeding infants, pregnant women with non-breast-feeding infants, and other pregnant women), and 91 veterinary strains were investigated in four groups (mastitis, reproductive tract infections, diseases other than
