Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor memory device, and particularly to a semiconductor memory device having a redundancy circuit. 2. Description of the Related Art There is a strong demand for semiconductor memory devices which include an increased number of chips, make a high operation speed possible, and are operable at a low power supply voltage. In general, when the number of chips is increased, memory capacity is lowered, and thus a cell array and a redundancy circuit are formed in a small area. Therefore, the number of cells connected to a single redundancy word line is increased. FIG. 4 is a circuit diagram showing the configuration of a conventional semiconductor memory device, particularly showing a redundancy circuit. Referring to FIG. 4, an address signal is divided into a bit line signal section 101 and a word line signal section 102. A redundancy decoder 103 decodes a redundancy code. When the redundancy code is not in the redundancy decoder 103, a write driver 4 receives a word line signal WL0 to write the decoded signal into the word line selection transistors T1-T8.
