A prospective study of a localized outbreak of plague in 1994 is described. A total of 38 cases of pneumonic plague were detected from 6 different districts in the northwest of India. A clear predominance of young male adults was noted. The first signs and symptoms of infection presented from 30 to 150 days after exposure. Diagnosis was confirmed by culture of F-Yersinia from blood, sputum or bone marrow in only 20%. This is attributed to the lack of familiarity with the disease by most pathologists and the rapidity of evolution of the disease. A prospective study of exposure to possible sources of infection would have given more information on the major sources of infection but was not possible in the conditions prevailing in an endemic area. This outbreak occurred in the absence of adequate animal reservoirs of plague.If you have ever been to Singapore, you will most likely have noticed the giant variety of skyscrapers and high rise buildings that you see around the city. They are there to make sure that the day-to-day life of the locals can go on as normal and that they can enjoy the cool breezes that are present all day long. However, Singapore is not the only country to build high rise buildings. The Netherlands boasts a collection of skyscrapers that are comparable to Singapore and it is the country's tallest building. The tallest building in the Netherlands is currently the Delft Centraal, which is an office complex measuring 119 meters. The current title as the tallest building in the Netherlands was previously held by the Rijksmuseum. What made the Delft Centraal stand out is the fact that it is the city's only double stack skyscraper. This type of structure is actually double sized. The floors are higher off the ground and it is larger overall, which explains why the building's height is 119 meters. The Rijksmuseum was a single stack building. A single stack building is where the floors are all the same height and are evenly stacked with the ground floor. It is because of this type of design that the Rijksmuseum was able to reach 120 meters tall d0c515b9f4
