ZeroRadar X64

The primary features of ZeroAccess are its ability to download other more malicious components such as adware or rootkit software to your computer, so that the Trojan can hide itself and remain undetected. ZeroAccess performs all of its malicious activity from within memory, so no hardware-related event is triggered by the virus. As a result, it can use all available RAM and swap space to do its bidding, and it usually won't even notice if your computer's hard disk is getting scarce. The Trojan targets computers running Windows operating systems, so while the virus can effectively operate on different versions of the OS, it will usually run into problems on modern devices. The malicious code is packed with a rootkit, which means it can remain completely hidden from traditional anti-virus programs, as they are incapable of dealing with software installed within memory. ZeroAccess is also capable of downloading additional malicious components to your system in order to carry out its scheme, as other adware and malware can be installed to the user's computer in an attempt to increase its income. ZeroAccess uses the Tor network to send all of the data it needs to its handlers, as it is running under proxy servers to conceal the fact that it is using the anonymity service. As with its peers in the malware arena, ZeroAccess includes in its code features that help it remain undetected, as no removable files are created that could have their integrity examined by antivirus software. The Trojan uses the following protocols to perform all of the actions it needs to carry out: Low-Privilege Shell DLL Injection Remote Procedure Call Specialized Message Queue Encrypted File System Tunneling "Drives" to Store Files ZeroAccess Features: ZeroAccess attempts to remain hidden on your computer. ZeroAccess is capable of interacting with the Tor network, and it uses this connection to conceal its presence and activity. ZeroAccess can silently add components to your computer, and it uses this ability to infect it with other malicious programs. ZeroAccess can use the computer's browsing capabilities to carry out Internet-based tasks. ZeroAccess is capable of generating and distributing spam. ZeroAccess collects information about your computer and then sends this information to its handlers. ZeroAccess can install and use other adware programs to its advantage.
