During a 35-month period, 26 acromegalic patients who had not responded adequately to treatment with a somatostatin analogue were treated with bromocriptine and/or octreotide. 19 patients were treated with bromocriptine alone and 5 with both octreotide and bromocriptine. The mean age of the patients was 45 years. The mean follow up after the beginning of treatment was 15 months. A sustained decrease in serum GH levels was observed in all patients. Serum IGF-I levels and serum GH levels assessed by a 4-hour insulin tolerance test also decreased significantly. The doses of bromocriptine and octreotide were adequate to maintain normal IGF-I levels. In some patients, the decrease in serum IGF-I levels was accompanied by a further decrease of serum GH levels suggesting a possible feedback between the two hormones. The best results were obtained in the subgroup of patients with GH levels between 10 and 20 micrograms/l: mean final GH levels were 4.0 micrograms/l, compared to 15.2 micrograms/l before the treatment. Side effects included edema, weight gain, headache and vertigo in four patients; in one patient the tumor increased in size. We conclude that octreotide is ineffective for the treatment of acromegaly and bromocriptine appears to be efficient even when GH levels exceed 20 micrograms/l, but does not prevent growth of the tumor.
