Q: ExtJS StackedOverflowToolbar not showing up I have a toolbar that I'd like to be displayed in the bottom center of the page. Instead the bottom right of the page. The toolbar has "Title" and "Overflow" checkboxes. I've included a complete sample app below. I've also included a screen shot of what I'm seeing. A more complete app with the combo, stackoverflow toolbar, and form with validation (marked with *): A: This looks to me like an issue with the default layout the application is using. You should be able to replicate the exact behavior as seen in the tool/overflow example by specifying your own layout. layout: { type: 'vbox', align:'stretch' } Since there is no layout specified in the example app, the default being used is being used. If you want to see the Layout issue, you can set it to be vbox, and also remove the iconStyle in the titlebar that is being used for the close button. The close button will be displayed if you remove the iconStyle as in this example. Q: Looping data based on number of rows I am trying to make a loop to work out my data and I am creating a graph. I'm trying to make a loop that will add a "x" to my data and the loop needs to start once the first row is complete, then add another "x" to the same line, and so on until its the last x in the graph. I am using SQL. I have got this so far, and it adds the "x" but it doesn't add to the same line SELECT [Extract Date], [Source], [Destination], [Type], [Amount], [Estimated Cost], [Total] FROM (SELECT [Extract Date], [Source], [Destination], [Type], [Amount], [Estimated Cost], [Total]

Fibroblast growth factor-2 increases axonal regeneration across an injured optic nerve. Fibroblast growth factor-2 (FGF-2) is an axon-dilating neurotrophic factor; it increases the survival and regeneration of damaged peripheral axons, especially those of the spinal cord. We examined the effect of FGF-2 on axonal regeneration after injury to the rat optic nerve. FGF-2 was injected into the vitreous humor and applied locally to the injury site by means of a micropipette. In addition, the facial nucleus was transected to produce complete axotomy. The animals were then evaluated at weekly intervals by behavioral testing and electrophysiologic techniques. Low-dose injections of FGF-2 did not significantly increase the recovery of any of the behavioral parameters tested. In contrast, higher doses of FGF-2 enhanced recovery of visual function and behavioral indexes of sensibility. This enhancement of recovery was evident at early post-injury intervals and persisted until testing was discontinued at week 24. One exception to this was the injection of 100 ng of FGF-2 into the left eye. This produced a temporary decrease in light perception, followed by a more persistent reduction in visual function. This effect was likely to be caused by a transient constriction of the pupil in the treated eye. These data provide the first evidence that FGF-2 enhances axonal regeneration of the optic nerve after injury, and are consistent with the hypothesis that the beneficial effect of FGF-2 on peripheral axon survival and regeneration is not solely a result of its ability to prevent apoptosis.
