You can create a selection based on any combination of color, color harmony, contrast, or value. Figure 5-23: Quick selection helps you create a selection and make an adjustment layer. Q: How is EOS better than Ethereum? I'm trying to understand EOS and how it's better than Ethereum. I understand that EOS has its own blockchain (which I assume is faster and better) and also a side chain where contracts can be stored and deployed. The more I read about EOS, the more confused I am. I understand it has smart contracts, (which Ethereum also has), but it seems like EOS is just copying a lot of the features from Ethereum (including the idea of what a contract is). How is EOS better than Ethereum? I'm trying to understand where the advantages are. A: I'm trying to understand EOS and how it's better than Ethereum. It's worth keeping in mind that EOS is a platform, not a blockchain. Ethereum is a blockchain, and a platform is built on top of it. EOS has been architected for scalability and flexibility, but it still implements smart contracts as they currently exist in Ethereum, though they're written with bytecode (I believe) rather than EVM bytecode. EOS makes it much easier to create custom contracts that integrate with the EOS contracts written for the EOS network, and make them upgradable. Smart contracts can contain any code you want, but EOS-based contracts also have a lot of security features. For instance, while Ethereum smart contracts are open to all to see, EOS-based smart contracts are restricted to the paying client. The state of the contract is immutable, and it's "well-typed" in the same way that Solidity or Serpent are. EOS has features built on top of it, like EOSVM, and EOS-DAC. EOSVM is a language developed for designing smart contracts for the platform. The EOS blockchain itself is distributed, and the nodes can operate in parallel. It's very easy to create your own tokens on top of EOS and use them in contracts, and your tokens are also immutable on the chain. EOS is fairly cheap to run, and I haven't done the maths, but node costs are much cheaper than for Ethereum. It's not fair to compare Ethereum and EOS in the abstract, because they're different technologies. You should compare them in the context of what you'd like to achieve with your dApp. A: EOS is a platform designed for smart contracts
