Working memory (WM) is important for various cognitive functions, and it is critical for attention, orientation, and task performance. It should be evaluated for compensating the volume of the brain lesion in brain-damaged patients. The spatial working memory (SWM) test has been designed to evaluate WM capacity using an array of objects, and has been used to distinguish brain-damaged patients from healthy controls. This study examined the parietal lobe area by using the SWM test, with the aim of clarifying the relationship between the WM and the specific parietal lobe area. These results indicated that the left parietal cortex may contribute to WM, possibly for stimulus identification and response selection as well as for visual spatial processing. in a due process analysis, the creditor has an interest in "protecting its contractual rights".
