Young M.A.s could be read, but British readers were asked to read and make up a tune of their own. So, for example: All those years ago that M.A.s were young you could readThe M.A.s, You could teach them but not make them young. M.A.s and North America In 1956, Canadian actor/musician Charles Gordon-Moss ran a contest among Canadian students to name the Great White North. The winner was featured in a series of reprints of many of the most famous Canadian stories, both traditional and by Canadians. For example, the most famous Canadian story, Rip Van Winkle, was retold by a Canadian teacher who addressed American students with: Canada is north of us, and north of us, as you may know, is that little country, the United States of America. An amusing comment he made about Rip Van Winkle is that he was "the only Canadian out of a thousand who had never read the story". He was astonished to find that Rip had only read the newspaper in his single twenty-year sleep, presumably the morning Herald. Another Canadian writer, Henry Weed Fitch, emphasized the North Canadian view: "Canada is the adjective with the capital 'C,' " then using a list of countries to prove his point. To which, a British reader responded, "Aha! You Canadians started adding `A' to everything even before you lost the War." As Canada was viewed by Britain as a singular place and British English a singular dialect, many felt that Canada should not be grouped with the USA. Writer Wilton A. Speaks noted a peculiarity of British readers of Canadian names: "In English, the names can often sound more than a little odd, because of the different pronunciation of the final letter in words like 'Val-ditch' and 'Val-dine'" wrote Mr Speaks in 1962. "Now the story goes that the official French pronunciation is pronounced 'val-die.' This not only reflects the French pronunciation, but also seems to imply that Canada is part of France. However, the Canadian government has never used the French pronunciation in official life, and the spelling of the French word for French language, la langue française, has never been altered." This reluctance to pronounce the name of Canada's official language, also known as the "mother tongue" (le

[Effects of various administration routes on the metabolism and pharmacokinetics of triazolam]. The effects of various administration routes on the metabolic turnover and pharmacokinetics of triazolam were studied. After oral administration of a single 30 mg dose of triazolam, there was a rapid increase in plasma concentrations of desmethylimidazolam (R-DLIM), an active metabolite of triazolam. The plasma concentrations of triazolam and R-DLIM peaked at a constant time after oral administration. When triazolam was administered intramuscularly or intravenously in a single 30 mg dose, R-DLIM was also rapidly and rather high in plasma concentrations than after oral administration. The peak concentration of R-DLIM reached after intramuscular injection was 5.2 times higher than that after oral administration. The pharmacokinetics of R-DLIM were also analyzed to investigate the effect of various routes of administration on the metabolism. After oral administration of a single 30 mg dose of triazolam, the 6d1f23a050
