Patch.Fancy having a look inside the F-35 Lightning II, the most advanced stealth fighter ever conceived? Never mind building one. You might never see it anyway. That's because the United States military's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter program does not exactly take direction from Congress. Instead, its funding is determined by a series of unelected, unaccountable bureaucrats, which include: Raytheon Lockheed Martin Boeing Northrop Grumman General Dynamics Maritime Component System "All the money in the world won't make our Government do what we want them to do," says one USAF officer. "The Senate Armed Services Committee doesn't issue orders to the Executive Branch. They just take out their checkbook and write checks." Even as it prepares to face off with some of the world's most technologically advanced weapons platforms, including the Chinese Chengdu J-20, the F-35 is already proving to be a harder sell than most military-industrial complexes can imagine. "The F-35 Joint Strike Fighter has proven to be plagued with costly, disruptive delays in both production and engine development," one RAND analysis found last year. The systems that will ultimately allow the F-35 to achieve the stealthy performance desired, the analysts found, were simply not ready. On a list of the world's most expensive weapons projects, the F-35 is surely top of the heap. A Pentagon study last year put the costs of purchasing, developing, testing, and producing the plane at $533 billion, not including the purchase of more than 2,
