(more…) »Q: C++ library - wrap functionality in new object instance I'm looking for a way to put functionality from a library into a new object type to be used within my code. Right now, the library is simply a sample implementation of something that could be included in a future project. For example, I have an object type Time that needs access to the time in relation to some reference frame. Time is just a dumb container that is specific to this project and the library doesn't have a concept of time measurement. (All it has is a single 'hours' and 'minutes' field.) However, the library does define the class referenceTime (Time with a few more fields), which contains methods that I can use to calculate reference time offset. What I want to do is take the Time class and wrap all the methods and fields in the Time class as attributes of a new referenceTime class. Basically, I want to essentially mimic the logic in referenceTime inside Time. That way, I can run the same method on Time with referenceTime and the logic will work the same way. Of course, I can't put a referenceTime instance inside Time (which is a dumb object container), but I can make it an attribute of Time. My problem is that I can't figure out how to make referenceTime an attribute of Time. The easiest thing I can think of is giving referenceTime a constructor that takes in Time and initializes the Time field. The problem with that is that the constructor will 6d1f23a050
