When capitalized, the term "Internet" refers to the collection of networks and gateways that use the TCP/IP suite of protocols. The Internet typically employs an architecture called the Internet Protocol (IP) network model. The IP network model is layered much like an onion, or a cascade of various layers. The inside most layer is called the "core," or "transport" layer. The core layer provides the required functionality to move data across a network from a source to a destination, and may include functionality such as addressing and fragmentation. The next layer out is called the "Internet" layer, the Internet layer provides functionality to move data across a network based on the best-effort, or end-to-end principle, such as IP. A key part of the Internet layer's function is packet switching, or transferring data between a source and a destination. To allow data to travel between networks, two standards called the Point-to-Point Tunneling Protocol (PPTP) and Layer Two Tunneling Protocol (L2TP), as well as other tunneling protocols, were developed. PPTP is a tunneling protocol developed by Point to Point Communications, Inc. of Fridley, Minn., and used with the IP. PPTP transmits TCP traffic across an L2TP tunnel, over an L2TP tunnel, and then into IP space. L 6d1f23a050
