The purpose of this study was to determine whether unconditioned stimuli (US) become less effective with age. Ten young and 10 old participants were conditioned for one session and tested for extinction of conditioned response (CR) with and without an interstimulus interval (ISI) following the US. Discriminability and various shock contingencies were examined. Both the young and the old groups received similar percentages of positive and negative trials during the acquisition phase. The young group demonstrated extinction with and without an ISI following the US, whereas the old group exhibited extinction only without an ISI. Since the old group is more likely to have additional significant health problems and factors such as hearing and the possibility of medication effects could contribute to the reduced extinction of the old group, these findings seem to provide evidence that the old adults' CR is being expressed differently than the young adults' CR.Screening for visual impairments in preschool-aged children in kindergarten: research and practice. Many preschoolers are at risk for visual impairment (VI). To achieve optimal outcomes of eye health and vision development in children, screening should be initiated in the preschool years and continued in kindergarten. The purpose of this article is to provide an overview of the scientific literature regarding such screening. A systematic review of children's vision screening research in the 1970s and 1980s was conducted in August 2015. Relevant articles were retrieved using PubMed, PsycINFO, Scopus, and the bibliographies of identified articles. In addition, clinical practice guidelines were reviewed for any relevant research conducted since the 1970s. The review yielded no identified studies in children's vision screening research conducted from 1970 to 1998. There are no guidelines specific to vision screening in preschool-aged children in the United States. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, screeners recommended that children age 3 years 6 months to 4 years old be screened annually. Current standards for vision screening in children age 3 years 1 month to 5 years include a 6-month interval between screenings. The preschool screening recommendations were based on limited data, which have not been supported by subsequent scientific research. Screeners need data, guidelines, and tools to minimize false-positive and false-negative screening results, which can lead to unnecessary treatment of children who do not need eye
