although acupuncture has been practiced in china for more than 2,000 years, and in other parts of asia for more than 4,000 years, it is relatively new to the western world. western doctors and scientists thought that the eastern practice was far too obscure to be of any use. however, the findings of the above studies suggest that the effects of laser acupuncture are likely to be the same as those associated with needle acupuncture, and that further research is warranted. it is worth noting that there have been successful clinical trials of laser acupuncture for the treatment of chronic low back pain, where there was statistically significant improvement in comparison to sham laser acupuncture. these studies also involved electrical stimulation of the laser acupuncture needle, which is a novel approach to the therapy. in fact, laser acupuncture for the treatment of low back pain has been shown to be more effective than both prescription opioids and spinal cord stimulation, and has also been shown to be at least as effective as manual therapy. laser acupuncture is usually best used for symptoms that are mild to moderate in severity, and can be used as a first treatment modality to reduce pain and improve function, and it can also be used for more complex cases. the optimal laser device for laser acupuncture is a laser diode, such as a laser diode which emits a range of wavelengths, which can be absorbed by tissue, or an erbium-doped fiber laser, which uses a glass fiber as the transmitting medium. despite the widespread use of needle acupuncture in the world, acupuncture is not supported by evidence from clinical trials for most indications. to date, we have been unable to provide any evidence to support the use of acupuncture in the treatment of any chronic pain condition, and no study has demonstrated that acupuncture is effective for any chronic pain condition.

of course, i am not alone in this position. the current editorial team for chiropractic & manual therapies is composed of many individuals who have made an important contribution to the development of the journal, including a number of former editors and former editorial teams. in addition, there are many people who have actively supported the journal by contributing their time, effort and expertise. the editorial team would like to thank all of these individuals for their support, as well as their ongoing efforts to make the journal what it is today. laser acupuncture is a type of light therapy designed to stimulate acupuncture points on the surface of the skin. light is projected into the skin with a small probe called a fiber optic and causes the acupuncture point to vibrate. the needle on the tip of the probe is a subdermal needle that goes into the fascia and stimulates the body's own endorphin production. this, in turn, produces the same results as traditional acupuncture, in addition to speeding up the healing process. because it is a noninvasive technique, it is becoming more widely accepted and is often performed by advanced practitioners, who combine laser and traditional acupuncture techniques. types of lasers used for laser acupuncture include the neodymium:yttrium-aluminum-garnet (nd:yag) laser, the pulsed dye laser, and the diode laser. the nd:yag laser is most often used, but the diode laser is most effective for treating larger areas. the pulse width is the most important factor in the energy level to the skin. the diode laser, with a wavelength of 810 nm, is more effective at warming the acupuncture point. the pulse width should be at least 1 second. the diode laser is also useful for achieving deeper penetration than the nd:yag laser. 5ec8ef588b
