He said he had only been to Tunnel Creek once, at about 2 a.m. on a rainy, windy night two winters ago. Hes since watched one of his best friends die in an avalanche at Tunnel Creek, and now hes questioned himself to keep going back. "This is not the usual Tunnel Creek," said Sarah Scott, a ski patrollers supervisor at Castle Mountain, just south of Stevens Pass. Over the years, she says, she has become very familiar with the hills and slopes of Tunnel Creek, where she and other ski patrollers work from 4:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. It is not unusual to see an avalanche at Tunnel Creek at the end of the day when there is virtually no one on the hill, but it is unusual to see a whole snowcat sheath up at one of the clear-cut sites during the winter. Even at the peak of the season, the ski patrollers work on Tunnel Creek just a handful of days, usually Wednesdays and Saturdays. On Tuesday night, though, Scott and her crew were at Tunnel Creek with storm-surge winds gusting well above 40 mph. They watched as the snowcat snagged a rope and wound its way through the rubble at the side of the hill. Then, one patroller ran down the hillside and held the rope while the other grabbed a hand-pulley bar to move the snowcat while the rope was adjusted. Finally, the rope released and the snowcat reversed, pushing back up against the steep hillside. Tunnel Creek is regularly assessed for avalanche risk. The ski patrol, which has about 40 employees, sends a helicopter to the area four times a year to measure the snowpack, the lay of the land, and how much snow there is above the tree line at Tunnel Creek, said Randy Orton, who for the past six years has worked as ski patrol director at Ski Beech. The helicopter drops a sensor, known as an "emission device," which can trigger an avalanche of data in a computer. Meanwhile, crews walk the steep hillsides and scout for potential victims. Skiers and snowboarders are trained to look for snowcat tracks or shovel marks in the snow. On each trip, the helicopter crew watches for sign of avalanches, but only to the extent that every life, person, animal and tree are precious, Orton said.

Less than 30 seconds after Brennan stopped, he saw Tim Wangen cut through the trees above the earlier arrivals, gliding horizontally through the forest. Wangen had been taught how to navigate Tunnel Creek by his father. He knew that the farther down the mountain he went, the harder it would be to cut over the ridge and into the next big meadow. He crossed the shallow gully and rose up the other side. The perceived threat that caused the all-out evacuation was the feeling that a small avalanche had triggered and carried climbers downhill. Shortly after the evacuation began, a warning flashed across the screen of the radio at the volunteer station at Tunnel Creek. I train with Tunnel Creek when Im in Sun Valley. I was just recently at a contest there and I was hitting the same slopes and everyone was competing with me. And I just feel like Im always in this glorious place that I want to share with you. But I just want to take you on the trips. Where are you going to be? Most people cant imagine that part of it.
