NanoCore claims that it can do all this and more. The tool was first unveiled in a malicious website in late 2017 and since then, there are many legitimate projects that have been exposed for the public to work on and distribute. One of such projects is the NanoCore project on Github. The first thing to notice is that NanoCore uses the same known text decoder technique as did its predecessor, Backdoor.Notdec0d3r which was among the first of its kind discovered in 2013 by security researchers. The development team behind this RAT likes to use this technique as it allows the hackers to avoid detection from antivirus software. This is unlike the known code techniques, which try to come up with new and unique ways for the hackers to avoid detection, allowing them to manipulate their tools into not looking suspicious. Hence, NanoCore is often referred to as the “old school” RAT, and is embraced by those who truly believe in taking advantage of the weak and the less technically savvy. The next obvious question to ask is if NanoCore is a new RAT or a new version of an existing one. It is neither. It is both. It utilizes the same technique as its predecessor Backdoor.Notdec0d3r does. It also brings back some of the features from its predecessor, such as remote code execution and the ability to conduct DoS attacks, but with a number of upgrades and functional changes as well. Unfortunately, all it takes is a quick Google search to find tons of RATs that look similar to NanoCore. In fact, the report from earlier this year had revealed that 90% of the new RATs being distributed in a malicious software pack were identified as belonging to the Backdoor.Notdec0d3r and Backdoor.Nordic families.
