red faction: guerrilla is based on the enormously successful red faction franchise. the series started in 2005 with the original red faction, a primitive, vehicular-based game that offered one of the most memorable game experiences of that year. in red faction: armageddon, the series takes a step forward, taking what was great about the first game and making it even better. the original guerrilla was praised for a simple premise: blow stuff up. but it was also criticized for the weapons and vehicles being too weak, and even when the sequel came out in 2009, many players were underwhelmed. red faction: guerrilla is nothing like that. it has a much bigger scale, just like many games of the series. mars is bigger than your average map, and you'll frequently find yourself blowing things up in a large scale as you protect your home base. the weapons are a bit more powerful, and everything feels a bit more balanced. it's the perfect mix of vehicular mayhem and open-world sandbox. when i first started playing through red faction guerilla on the playstation 2, i remember thinking that the game was fun, but it wasn't the best of the genre. with that in mind, red faction guerilla: re-mars-tered's re-release isn't the most needed game on the switch eshop. however, it does benefit from some nice quality of life enhancements, like the ability to use touch controls to interact with the environment and adjust the camera, something that has been sorely missing from third-person shooters on consoles since at least call of duty 4. in the original release, you could only use the joy-cons' motion controls to play a couple of set missions, which weren't particularly memorable. since the switch has more space, there's room for more missions and characters, as well as a larger library of weapons and vehicles. there are also a handful of new vehicles, such as the centurions tank and the industrial-grade h-k jetpack. the original game never offered offline play, but red faction guerilla: re-mars-tered adds fully playable online.
