The Eye-Fi user interface is still a bit quirky, but I've grown accustomed to it over the course of my three weeks with the software, and personally I find it much more streamlined than Lightroom's (non-Touch) lack of a similar tool. Photos I'll want to get off my iPad can be exported and converted without leaving Photoshop at all. Where the program excels is in how many ways you can explore your images. It's not overly confusing, but the layout can be confusing at times. For instance, the Photo Enhance tab has been moved from the Project panel to a new window. For similar reasons, basic lens corrections are now a menu item and not a panel you have to find. You can also drag the layers around to get them out of order. This works much better than in the past, when some were hard to find and use, as you had to waste time arranging the order before you were able to move them. There are two problems that came up again. First, you couldn't zoom out to see the larger context of a photo, so there wasn't always a clear sense of perspective. Second, the tooltips are sparse and often too brief to give you all the information you need. If you're using Motion 5 and it's been a while since you've examined the other tools in the software, you may need more help to find your way around. Overall, Photoshop CC is easily the most used and versatile tool to edit RAW photos available. The long-term benefits of the Eye-Fi technology are apparent, and the performance improvements are substantial. I can't wait to see how the software evolves.
