Ventricular remodeling is frequently associated with atrial fibrillation in hypertensive patients. The pathophysiology of atrial fibrillation (AF) is not well understood and the predictors of its development in the individual patient remain to be determined. The aim of this study was to explore the association between AF and left ventricular (LV) geometry in hypertensive patients. From a prospective, single-center cohort of 533 hypertensive patients referred to our hypertension clinic, we identified 99 patients (30% female) without AF at baseline. The patients were followed up for 12 months and underwent echocardiographic assessment. The association between AF and LV geometry (normal geometry, concentric remodeling, concentric hypertrophy, eccentric hypertrophy, and eccentric remodeling) was explored at baseline, at 12 months, and in the entire cohort. A new onset of AF was registered in 19 patients during the follow-up period. AF was significantly associated with a higher prevalence of concentric remodeling and eccentric hypertrophy. The odds ratios of AF were 4.6 (1.2 to 17.2) for concentric remodeling and 10.7 (3.1 to 37.7) for eccentric hypertrophy, when compared with the reference category. The odds ratios of AF were 3.3 (1.1 to 9.8) for
