For people who use Adobe Lightroom, Photoshop has often been the one to install and update. This is primarily because the Lightroom app is less resource-intensive and is usually quite fine without some of the more complex features. In 2017, that's not entirely true. Adobe has implemented some of these features, but at the cost of usability and even stability. Of course, you should have a fully functioning system if you want to have Lightroom. But it is still there to be updated and enhanced. I am visiting the very impressive and large Nokia Museum on the beautiful Åland Islands in Finland. I am using the hostel as my base where I will be spending a day, a week or possibly a month. The museum does not have a BLOG. It has a social media link on their website. It has a Twitter and a Facebook. It has an Instagram account. On the website it has a Flickr account, and of course a Fark account. But I do not have a wordpress account. Instead, I have a Google account. So I cannot actually push a content update on their website. The link to my account is broken in their social media accounts so that I cannot share anything. I do not have a phone call with them to ask them to do this. Instead I have a third party() provider that is proceeding to fix my account. They have promised, not that I will be able to change my labels or anything else. But it still takes time. For the blogger who isn't me, this was a good week. I didn't know it, but I actually did one better than my previous week: I promised that I'd not be working on the review for a week. This week I failed to keep that promise. Today I want to tell you why, and what I should have been working on instead.
