β -Amyloid ($A\beta$) aggregation and clearance during Alzheimer's disease (AD) are core events in the pathogenesis of AD. Since $A\beta$ production and clearance are tightly coupled and genetic manipulation of APP processing in transgenic mice shows that APP processing affects $A\beta$ clearance in vivo, it is generally believed that the $A\beta$ profile itself influences the clearance of $A\beta$. In line with this belief, the failure to clear $A\beta$ causes AD. Such feedback between $A\beta$ clearance and $A\beta$ production has been also suggested in humans. Nevertheless, evidence for such feedback has been contradictory. In this study we investigated the influence of $A\beta$ levels on the clearance of $A\beta$ through determining the effect of $A\beta$ concentration on $A\beta$ clearance dynamics in AD transgenic mice and a fibrillar $A\beta$ assay using serum. Our results show that the half-life of $A\beta$ in serum increases as $A\beta$ concentrations increases. Moreover, we observe that the clearance of $A\beta$ in vivo is slower in serum than in brain homogenate. In both AD transgenic mice and in fibrillar $A\beta$ assays, the half-life of $A\beta$ is longer when the $A\beta$ concentration is increased. In contrast to the
