Site-directed mutagenesis of HIV-1 reverse transcriptase: resistance to nucleoside analogues. Site-directed mutagenesis of HIV-1 reverse transcriptase has been used to introduce amino acid substitutions into protease and reverse transcriptase, the two enzymatic domains of the retroviral polymerase, and to investigate resistance to three widely used antiretroviral drugs [zidovudine (AZT), didanosine (ddI) and nevirapine (NVP)]. A large number of constructs were created and analyzed for production of catalytically active proteins following expression in Escherichia coli. A number of amino acid substitutions in protease were identified which conferred resistance to one or more of the three nucleoside analogue inhibitors AZT, ddI and NVP, consistent with results published previously. Those amino acid substitutions which increased susceptibility to inhibitors were located in two groups: in the P1 loop (residues 50, 52, 54, 68, 70, 72, 73 and 74) and in the P2 loop (residues 136, 140 and 145). Substitutions in the P1 loop of protease also conferred resistance to a second class of nucleoside analogue inhibitor, the non-nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitor, lamivudine (3TC) (Vandamme et al., Nucleic Acids Res 1995; 23: 3033-3041). Q: c++ socket not processing request if not called from thread I have a simple client server example that uses raw TCP to do the socket communication. I have a client and server. In the main application thread I call the accept function on the server to start listening for client connections. I then call a run function (a simple infinite loop) on the server and print out a line to the console every 2 seconds. The accept is called on a different thread that is set to a specific priority - 4. If I call accept on the server from the main application thread, the client connects and the loop runs as expected. If I call accept from the main application thread, and just use accept() in the run function to accept the connection I never receive the expected
