While Lightroom is perfect for all aspects of the digital workflow, Photoshop is generally used in 1) image editing, 2) fine-tuning and 3) composition. The table below highlights some of the core differences between Lightroom and Photoshop: When making photo or graphics manipulation images, it is necessary to accommodate artwork that has specific properties such as lighting, colors, sizes and background that needs to be taken into consideration. Adobe Photoshop makes it possible to manage all these aspects without the need for costly software like Adobe Lightroom or Photoshop. Since Adobe Photoshop is a comprehensive photo editing software, each and every one of you must understand what aspects should be prioritized and which ones must be neglected. For example, your main goal might be to stylize the image where you are interested in colors and drastically changing the background for instance, but the lighting should remain the same. When it comes to the purpose, you must be able to change the brightness, contrast, shadows/shapes, and you want to change the backgrounds. Also, you might need to adjust the same specific photo in various prep and post options for different purposes such as changing your photo to black & white, or changing your photo into muted colors. For instance, white background scenes will give your post a different approach than a black background which will inevitably influence the image as a whole, especially if you want to eliminate main features. Hence, it is very important that you understand the different features and functions of Adobe Photoshop.
